

HOSPITALITY BUILT AMERICA'S ROADS

THE 8-MILE RULE: HOW TAVERNS CREATED AMERICA

Before the railroad, before the automobile, and before the highway system, America was stitched together by a network of taverns. The space didn't follow the road. The road followed the space.

Massachusetts legislators required inns to be placed at intervals "a day's horseback journey apart" — roughly every 8 miles — specifically because wayfarers without a tavern were compelled to request shelter from private citizens. As American Heritage notes, "legislators of Puritan times had decidedly mixed feelings about alcohol, [but] they sanctioned taverns in order to provide wayfarers with shelter and sustenance."^[2] Janet Fortran, American Heritage, Vol. 54 Issue 3

The result was a national hospitality network built before the nation itself. Star Tavern's research on the Great Wagon Trail — the trail running from Pennsylvania through the Appalachian Valley to Georgia — describes thousands of families traveling this path in search of opportunity, with taverns providing the only reliable food and shelter along the way.^[1] startavern.net

THE TOWN-BUILDING FORMULA

In new settlements, the sequence of construction plans showed that taverns we're a priority. In 1755, of the seven or eight houses in Salisbury, North Carolina, four were taverns or inns. One local clergyman reportedly lamented that the tavern was faring far better than the church in the competition for men's souls.^[2] American Heritage, Vol. 54 Issue 3

THE 8-MILE RULE — STAGECOACH ROUTE LOGIC

0 miles — Town center, starting point

8 miles — First tavern. Horses watered, travelers fed, news exchanged.

16 miles — Second tavern. Midday stop. Commerce conducted. Letters posted.

24 miles — Third tavern. Overnight lodging. One full day's journey completed.

Source: American Heritage Vol. 54 Issue 3; Star Tavern, startavern.net

4 OF 8

Buildings in 1755 Salisbury, NC were taverns or inns

American Heritage, Vol. 54 Issue 3 — Janet Fortran

1635

First commercial brewery licensed in America — driven by tavern demand

Massachusetts Bay Colony licensed Captain Robert Sedgwick as first "common brewer" — American Heritage

Sources: Janet Fortran, American Heritage Vol. 54 Issue 3; Star Tavern, startavern.net